

Axes to Axes: the Chronology, Distribution, and Composition of Recent Bronze Age Hoards in the UK

By CHRISTOPHER J. GRIFFITHS

The following two Appendices summarise key data used in the article. Appendix S1 lists 385 Bronze Age hoards which were reported between 1997 and 2021 and which were included in the analyses. It also includes 18 base-metal hoards which were discovered prior to the enactment of the Treasure (Designation) Order 2002, meaning that they did not qualify as Treasure. Hoards are listed alphabetically by county/unitary authority, first for England, then Northern Ireland, Scotland, and Wales. The minimum number of objects listed here might differ from that shown in the corresponding record, particularly for those hoards which contain multiple fragments. A key to the sub-periods and the categorisation of hoards is included at the end of Appendix S1. The records for those hoards whose reference(s) contain the 'PAS' prefix can be viewed online and are accessible via the web database of the Portable Antiquities Scheme (<https://finds.org.uk/database>). Additional information was also obtained from the Treasure Annual Reports which were published by the DCMS (Department for Digital, Culture, Media and Sport), from Knight's study of Bronze Age metalwork from south-western England (2018, appendix 2 & 3) and from Needham's recent catalogue of Penard assemblages from Britain (2017, appendix 1). Details for recent hoard finds from Scotland were provided by the Treasure Trove Unit in Scotland and Matthew G. Knight and, for Northern Ireland, by Greer Ramsey.

An additional 14 finds are listed in Appendix S2 which represent possible Bronze Age hoards but were not included in the analyses of this paper. The reason for their exclusion is recorded, with the majority representing multiple fragments which are, or are likely to have, derived from the same object. Such instances present a challenge as to whether the fragments can be classified as a hoard or Treasure. Where it can be proven that the breaks between fragments occurred in antiquity, it is possible to suggest that the fragments represent separate objects and may thus constitute Treasure. On the contrary, if the breaks appear to have occurred post-deposition, then it is less likely that the fragments represent Treasure. In such cases, first-hand examination of the objects is important so that we can differentiate between pre-depositional and post-depositional damage whilst also acknowledging that, due to preservation and taphonomic factors, there might always be an element of uncertainty concerning the cause of damage.

Worth noting is that, within this dataset, there are two hoards from Britain which can be assigned to the Blackmoor Assemblage of the Late Bronze Age (c. 1020–920 BCE; Needham et al. 1997, 93). There is some dispute about whether the Blackmoor phase should be considered as an independent phase of its own (Gerloff 2007, 149–51) and whether it might, instead, represent a widespread form of weapon deposition (Mörtz et al. 2021, 367). In the analyses used in the paper, these possible Blackmoor hoards have been combined with the Ewart Park phase hoards, although they are labelled as 'Blackmoor/Ewart Park' within Appendix S1.
