

A Appendix

A.1 Link plot

Given the inherent difficulties of presenting between-outcome differences in a multinomial context, we also provide in this supplementary appendix section a visualization of between-outcome differences as a link plot. The panels in Figure A1 report all variables from Model 4. The position of each outcome (No—no event; Be—beating; Bu—burning; Bo—bombing) relative to the two horizontal axes indicates the size of the coefficient for each variable listed on the left hand side.¹⁹ For factor variables, the odds ratios (logit coefficients) refer to the effect size of a 0-1 change in the variable; for continuous variables the odds ratios (logit coefficients) represent the expected effect of a one standard deviation increase. Since tests of between-outcome significance involve multiple comparisons, we confine attention to between differences that are statistically significant at $p < .01$. Outcomes are linked by a dotted line when the between-outcome significance is not statistically significant at $p < .01$. In other words, when there is no line between one outcome and another, the coefficients on these outcomes are significantly different from each other with respect to the variable of interest.

¹⁹The vertical position has no interpretation — positions are chosen for ease of visualization only. Visualization was carried out using the “SPost13” suite of commands in Stata.

Note: No = no event; Bu = Burning; Be = Beating; Bo = Bombing

B.1 Hidden collinearity

Note that a common problem with high-dimensional multinomial logit models is when outcomes are completely determined as a consequence of hidden collinearity; that is, when an anomolous set of covariates in combination perfectly predict either no event, a burning, beating, or bombing. Scrutinizing the outputs of our regression models, this appears to be a concern — and so we follow the instructions set out in Stata (n.d.) and re-ran Model 4 after dropping observations with extremely small and extremely large predicted probabilities.²⁰ The results are in Table B.1. Reassuringly, dropping completely determined cases produces statistically and substantively similar results to those reported in Model 4 of Table 1.

²⁰See Stata. (n.d.): <https://www.stata.com/support/faqs/statistics/completely-determined-in-logistic-regression>.

B.2 Varying the Rabaa period

If bombings, unlike burnings and beatings, require organization and planning, might we not expect an increase in the incidence of armed attacks to materialize in the weeks after the Rabaa massacre? We test for this in Appendix Table B.3 by coding dummy variables for the 14, 21 and 28 days following the massacre. The results confirm the intuition. As time passes, the likelihood of burnings and beatings considerably attenuates, while we see an increased likelihood in bombings in the 2 weeks following the massacre — and this association also attenuates over time. Importantly, comparing between outcomes, the likelihood of burnings is always more likely to occur than either beatings or bombings ($p < .001$), suggesting that the principle effect of Rabaa was to increase the incidence of burnings, with a delayed increase in the incidence of bombings. This time-varying dynamic underlines the importance of qualitatively distinguishing between different types of ethnic violence as a function of the level of organization required to carry them out.

C Pre-trends in sectarian violence

One concern about our study is that it evaluates a unique time in Egypt’s history: the period immediately following Abdel Fattah al-Sisi’s counterrevolutionary coup and the subsequent re-imposition of authoritarianism. This raises the question of how representative this period is, and whether the level or nature of ethnic violence during this time may have been different than in earlier periods (e.g., before the 2011 revolution or during the post-revolution transition).

Our ethnic violence dataset begins in 2013, and other available datasets do not contain the level of sub-national granularity and the source diversity that ours does. We are therefore limited in our ability to evaluate ethnic violence dynamics in earlier periods with the level of rigor that we do in the main article. However, in order to put the period we analyze into broader context, and to address concerns about how representative it might be, below we lay out time series plots of ethnic violence from four different sources: the Daftar Ahwal Data Research Institute (DADRI), the Social Conflict Analysis Database (SCAD), and the Global Terrorism Database (GTD). Though they have a much more limited source base and do not operationalize ethnic violence in exactly the way we do, these datasets nevertheless allow us to get a sense of ethnic violence levels in Egypt over a longer historical period.

All the plots reveal a spike in ethnic violence in 2013 - the same post-coup spike that we observe in our dataset as well. This watershed political event was clearly a catalyst for unprecedented levels of violence against Christians in Egypt. A simple negative binomial model with daily counts of anti-Coptic violence as outcome and a binary pre- and post-coup variable as only regressor reveals that the post-coup period saw a significant increase in anti-Coptic violence.²¹ We then see, however, that violence levels somewhat revert to the levels observed before the revolution and during the transition (this is particularly evident in the figure using DADRI’s data, whose operationalization of ethnic violence is closest to ours). In this sense, the period we analyze covers both an extraordinary and unusual moment of ethnic violence, as well as a longer period of relative “normalcy.” As explained in the paper, we believe this is a strength of the analysis, as it allows to more clearly elucidate the different dynamics and logics of ethnic violence, some of which are central during these extraordinary periods and some of which explain violence during more normal periods. Further details of each dataset we use follows.

²¹Here we are controlling out the immediate Rabaa period so this refers solely to those days following the Coup that did not take place during the immediate post-Rabaa week.

- The first dataset comes from Daftar Ahwal Data Research Institute (DADRI), an Egyptian research organization that produces continually updated data on repression and violence in their “Socio-Data Repository,” to which the authors have access. These data derive from event reports across news media (principally “Youm7” and “al-Masry al-Youm”) as well as websites dedicated to Coptic Christian news, and social media. We present annual counts from their data, covering the period 2008 to 2021.
- The second dataset comes from the Social Conflict Analysis Database (SCAD) by Salehyan et al. (2012). This dataset is sourced from the wire services AP and AFP. These data code for ten different types of non-state violence, as well as the underlying “Issue” motivating the violence. Here, we keep all violence events coded as Issue 5 or 6, which refer to “ethnic discrimination, ethnic issues” and “religious discrimination, religious issues” and filter for whether the coded “target” of the violence contains the string “copt.” We present annual counts from their data, covering the period 1990 to 2018. Note that wire service reporting on Egypt was much lower during the 1990s, which could explain the relative scarcity of events during this decade.
- The third dataset comes from the Global Terrorism Database (GTD). Naturally, these data code only events that fit the GTD definition of a terror event: “the threatened or actual use of illegal force and violence by a non-state actor to attain a political, economic, religious, or social goal through fear, coercion, or intimidation” (START 2021, 11). For these data, we took all events from Egypt over the period 1980–2019. We then filtered these data to include only those targeted at “Private Citizens & Property” or “Religious Figures/Institutions.” We finally filtered the data to include only those events targeting Christians.
